CONTENTS

1. What are the qualifications to be a Marriage and Family Therapist? ...................... 2
2. Who are Marriage and Family Therapists?* ................................................................. 2
3. What is Marriage and Family Therapy?* ...................................................................... 3
4. Why use a Marriage and Family Therapist?* .............................................................. 3
5. What is some General Information about MFT?* ....................................................... 4
6. How is marriage and family therapy different from the other approaches to psychotherapy?* ............................................................................................................. 5
1. What are the qualifications to be a Marriage and Family Therapist?

Marriage and family therapy is a distinct professional discipline with graduate and post-graduate programs. Three options are available for those interested in becoming a marriage and family therapist: master's degree (2-3 years), doctoral degree (3-5 years), or post-graduate clinical training programs (3-4 years). Historically, marriage and family therapists have come from a wide variety of educational backgrounds including psychology, psychiatry, social work, nursing, pastoral counseling and education.

The Federal government has designated marriage and family therapy as a core mental health profession along with psychiatry, psychology, social work and psychiatric nursing. Currently all 50 states and the District of Columbia regulate the profession by licensing marriage and family therapists.

The regulatory requirements in most states are substantially equivalent to the American Association of Marriage and Family Therapists Clinical Membership standards. After graduation from an accredited program, a period - usually two years - of post-degree supervised clinical experience is necessary before licensure or certification. When the supervision period is completed, the therapist may be required to take a state licensing examination and/or the national examination for marriage and family therapists conducted by the Association of Marital and Family Therapy Regulatory Boards (AMFTRB). This exam is used as a licensure requirement in most states.

[back to top]

2. Who are Marriage and Family Therapists?

Marriage and Family Therapists (MFTs) are mental health professionals trained in psychotherapy and family systems, and licensed to diagnose and treat mental and emotional disorders within the context of marriage, couple and family systems.

Marriage and family therapists evaluate and treat mental and emotional disorders, other health and behavioral problems, and address a wide array of relationship issues within the context of the family system.

Marriage and family therapists broaden the traditional emphasis on the individual to attend to the nature and role of individuals in primary relationship networks such as marriage and the family. MFTs take a holistic perspective to health care; they are concerned with the overall, long-term well-being of individuals and their families.

MFTs have graduate training (a Master's or Doctoral degree) in marriage and family therapy and at least two years of clinical experience. Marriage and family therapists are recognized as a "core" mental health profession, along with psychiatry, psychology, social work and psychiatric nursing.

Since 1970 there has been a 50-fold increase in the number of marriage and family therapists. At any given time they are treating over 1.8 million people.

[back to top]
3. What is Marriage and Family Therapy?

A family's patterns of behavior influence the individual and therefore may need to be a part of the treatment plan. In marriage and family therapy, the unit of treatment isn't just the person even if only a single person is interviewed - it is the set of relationships in which the person is embedded.

Marriage and family therapy is:

- brief
- solution-focused
- specific, with attainable therapeutic goals
- designed with the end in mind

Marriage and family therapists treat a wide range of serious clinical problems including: depression, marital problems, anxiety, individual psychological problems, and child-parent problems.

Research indicates that marriage and family therapy is as effective, and in some cases more effective than standard and/or individual treatments for many mental health problems such as: adult schizophrenia, affective (mood) disorders, adult alcoholism and drug abuse, children's conduct disorders, adolescent drug abuse, anorexia in young adult women, childhood autism, chronic physical illness in adults and children, and marital distress and conflict.

Marriage and family therapists regularly practice short-term therapy; 12 sessions on average. Nearly 65.6% of the cases are completed within 20 sessions, 87.9% within 50 sessions. Marital/couples therapy (11.5 sessions) and family therapy (9 sessions) both require less time than the average individual treatment (13 sessions). About half of the treatment provided by marriage and family therapists is one-on-one with the other half divided between marital/couple and family therapy, or a combination of treatments.

[back to top]

4. Why use a Marriage and Family Therapist?

Research studies repeatedly demonstrate the effectiveness of marriage and family therapy in treating the full range of mental and emotional disorders and health problems. Adolescent drug abuse, depression, alcoholism, obesity and dementia in the elderly – as well as marital distress and conflict – are just some of the conditions marriage and family therapists effectively treat.

Studies also show that clients are highly satisfied with services of marriage and family therapists. Clients report marked improvement in work productivity, coworker relationships, family relationships, partner relationships, emotional health, overall health, social life, and community involvement.

In a recent study, consumers reported that marriage and family therapists are the mental health professionals they would most likely recommend to friends. Over 98 percent of clients of marriage and family therapists reported therapy services as good or excellent. After receiving treatment almost 90% of clients reported an improvement in their emotional health, and nearly two-thirds reported an improvement in their overall physical health. A majority of clients reported an improvement in their functioning at work, and over three-fourths of those receiving marital/couples or family therapy reported an improvement in the couple relationship. When a child is the identified patient, parents reported that their child’s behavior improved in 73.7% of the cases, their ability to get along with other children significantly improved and there was improved performance in school. Marriage and family therapy’s prominence in the mental health field has increased due to its brief, solution-focused treatment, its family-centered approach, and its demonstrated effectiveness. Marriage and family therapists are licensed in all 50 states and the District of Columbia and are recognized by the federal government as members of a distinct mental health discipline.

Today more than 50,000 marriage and family therapists treat individuals, couples and families nationwide. Membership in the American Association for Marriage and Family Therapy (AAMFT) has grown from 237 members in 1960 to more than 23,000 in 1996. This growth is a result in part, of renewed public awareness of the value of family life and concern about the increased stresses on families in a rapidly changing world.

[back to top]

5. What is some General Information about MFT?

- The field of Marriage and Family Therapy (MFT) originated about 50 years ago when health care clinicians began to seek more effective and comprehensive ways to treat disorders such as schizophrenia, anorexia, and alcoholism.

- MFT is one of the five core mental health disciplines (along with psychiatry, psychiatric nursing, psychology, and social work) recognized by the National Institutes of Mental Health. (42 U.S.C. 242a)

- MFT is recognized by the U.S. Public Health Service’s Health Resources Services Administration as a core mental health profession (along with psychiatrists, clinical psychologists, clinical social workers, psychiatric nurse specialists, and counselors). (42 CFR Part 5)

- Marriage and Family Therapists (MFTs) work with organizations, groups, families, couples, and individuals.

- MFTs view relational systems as frequent sources of stress and symptom formation.

- MFTs frequently treat anxiety, depression, substance abuse, adjustment disorders, marriage and family conflict, and behavioral disorders in children and adolescents.

- MFTs look at the client’s relationships within systems (friends, family, school, work, and culture) as a way of understanding the development of problems.

- MFTs focus on the power of relationships within systems as an instrument of change and healing.
MFTs pioneered brief, solution-focused, family-centered treatment, which seeks to pinpoint problems and complete therapy as soon as specific, concrete, measurable, and attainable therapeutic goals are met.

MFTs recognize that while disorders have relational consequences, sometimes treatment must also include medical consultation, psychiatric consultation, medication, psychological testing, and individual psychotherapy, and make appropriate referrals for such treatment when it is indicated.

MFTs come from a wide variety of backgrounds, such as medicine, psychology, psychiatry, nursing, counseling, and social work.

6. How is marriage and family therapy different from the other approaches to psychotherapy?

Marriage and family therapists are trained in various models of therapy in order to prepare them for work with families, couples, individuals, and larger human systems. Marriage and family therapy differs from the other approaches to mental health by thinking about people as being part of a larger system, such as their family. It is an interpersonal approach to psychotherapy, focusing on working with the relationships between members of a system. (For this reason some have suggested that more appropriate terms to describe this approach might be "relationship therapy" or "systemic therapy.") Other approaches to psychotherapy are traditionally intrapersonal, focusing on working with the internal processes (usually, a specific structural deficit) of an individual.

While some practitioners of the other approaches to psychotherapy may also incorporate some interpersonal techniques into their work, only an AAMFT Clinical Member is required to have had extensive specialized training and supervision in such an approach and to think in systemic terms. AAMFT Clinical members also observe a strict code of ethics which take family issues into consideration.

The systemic orientation and relational ethic, coupled with the rigorous training requirements, make those licensed marriage and family therapists who are also AAMFT Clinical Members uniquely qualified to provide mental health services.

Resources and Additional Links

- Qualifications of MFTs and FAQs
- Virginia Association for Marriage and Family Therapy FAQs
- Additional Information about the MFT Profession